"Do Whatever You Want but, you better watch out next time you see me coming…"
-Bob Dylan, 1965

In the liminal space between existence and oblivion, one observes the spectral figures of demons contending for the meager belongings that remain, biding their time for the inevitable moment of departure.

He finds himself reclined amidst the tall grasses of Frog Hollow Creek, a bullet wound piercing his chest. The conflict had been waged with valor, and just as the Union forces appeared to be on the verge of defeat, he experienced an agony that transcended anything he had previously conceived.

Reclining in that position, he contemplated the possibility that if he could manage to elevate himself, he might be able to simply walk away from his current predicament.
It was peculiar; he was not merely observing a repetition of his past experiences, or perhaps he was merely sidetracked by the intricate designs formed by the towering reeds.

As he focused intently, he began to discern unusual and bizarre patterns emerging in his surroundings.
He reminded himself of the necessity to document these revelations before this newfound ability to perceive them faded away.

The subsequent recollection that emerged in his mind was not of the ethereal Pearly Gates or the desolate expanse of hell; rather, it was the vivid image of regaining consciousness within a medical tent.
In this chaotic environment, he found himself in the unsettling presence of a nurse drenched in blood and a physician, whose inebriated state led him to engage in wagers regarding the duration of his patent's survival.

While at the evacuation center, anticipating the arrival of a wagon train to transport him back home,

the attending nurse
presented him with a collection of drawings that she asserted he had created during the previous month, a period
in which he oscillated
between consciousness
and the unknown.
She informed him that once he fully regained his mental faculties, he would likely implore her for more paper, as he felt an urgent need to document the myriad experiences he had encountered at Frog Hallow Creek.

The narrative relayed to me by my grandmother centered around her grand uncle, who holds the distinction of being the sole Confederate soldier
